A HISTORY OF THE PICTON HARBOUR Provided by the Naval Marine Archive: the Canadian Collection

Carved from limestone by retreating glaciers at the end of the last ice age, Picton Bay has served travellers along the North shore of Lake Ontario for thousands of years. The First Nations, both Iroquois and Algonquin, used it as part of the portage through East and West Lakes. Samuel de Champlain was perhaps the first European to see the Bay in 1615, but it was not until the arrival of the Loyalists, that permanent settlement truly started.

In 1790, Lieutenant Moore Hovenden built the first inn here in the village of Hallowell. The village was named after a grant of land to an early Loyalist, to the Northwest of the bridge over the creek feeding in to the head of the Bay. The settlement started modestly with just a few log cabins, but the scene was set as one of the very first trading stops between Cataraqui and York – now Kingston and Toronto. Two years later, the county was named after Prince Edward, Duke of Kent and father of Queen Victoria. By 1802, the Danforth Road, now known as the Loyalist Parkway, passed over the Hallowell bridge. As commerce increased, more homes and a second inn sprung up and shipbuilding commenced. A few years later, another village was established to the south of the creek and named after the most-senior General to fall at the Battle of Waterloo - Picton. Lumber was at the origins of booming trade, leading to the building of more wharves and schooners. After the amalgamation of the two villages, the head of the Bay was dredged allowing increased shipping activity, including regular stops by passenger ships. Fruit and coal were added to the list of regular merchandise. Cold stores were added on the docks, and in 1874 Lord Dufferin, Governor General of Canada, signed the incorporation papers of the Ontario and Quebec Navigation Company, whose twenty-three original shareholders were all local merchants. Many of their descendants' surnames can still be found in our local phone directory.

Steam-powered ships overtook the building of sailing vessels by John Tait and many others, but this did not stop the Hepburn brothers from creating two shipyards capable of building and repairing large vessels. By the turn of the twentieth century, some 350,000 tons of goods were being handled annually in Picton Harbour. Eventually, Canada Steamship Lines built offices at the head of the Bay, not only to manage their freight and passengers, but also heralding in some thirty years of day-trips. This time was known as “the picnic days” and the day-trips were extremely popular with county residents who could dress in their finery and enjoy the company of family and friends.

The Picton Harbour Inn Docks during the Picnic Days, nearly 100 years ago - From a postcard

Today, the head of Picton Bay is no longer used for freight, however the harbour remains extremely busy. Pleasure-boating, yachting and sport fishing (with dockage and moorings for hundreds of boats) can be seen on the bay. The Picton Harbour Inn gives visitors a sense of the area's rich maritime history. Adorning the walls of the guest rooms and the Lighthouse Restaurant are many photographs, engravings and drawings of Picton Harbour scenes, the county's lighthouses and many of the ships that used the harbour.

A wealth of local maritime history and artifacts can be found at the Mariners' Park Museum in South Bay, and at the Naval Marine Archive and the Canadian Society of Marine Artists at 205 Main Street in Picton.
